Terms in which students study taught modules are teaching terms. Terms in which students study for their dissertation are called writing up terms.

Each teaching term is made up of 10 substantive teaching weeks (not including induction). Each term usually has a break mid-way through the term.

You must attend the relevant University Campus / login to ELITE up to four days per week in teaching weeks and for your scheduled examinations in exam weeks. Attendance is not required during holiday, reading and revision weeks.

Attendance at all workshops is compulsory.

Each teaching day will involve either two or four hours of workshop tuition. Students can also expect additional compulsory and optional tuition and/or training (for example, Research Methods Training) to take place throughout the teaching weeks. Where possible, this is arranged on days when students are already studying.

An average teaching week is comprised of one two-hour workshop per module studied plus Research Methods training for LLM and MSc students. This is in addition to each student's guided self-study.

5. Summary of Key Learning Outcomes

Knowledge and understanding of principles related to the chosen specialism; cognitive (thinking) skills of critical analysis, problem-solving, and critical judgement and evaluation; practical legal skills of research and communication; and associated transferable skills.

6. Learning Environment

Full-Time LLM and MSc Students

Four taught modules and one dissertation module (which includes research methods training) studied across three terms spanning one calendar year. In term 1, a comprehensive two-week induction followed by two taught modules plus some research methods training. In term 2, two taught modules plus further research methods training. In term 3, the dissertation module. Each module is assessed at the end of the term in which the module is completed. Preparation for taught workshop sessions of up to 32 hours per week, including library and IT-based research. This can also include lecture content which is recorded and available on the University's Virtual Learning Environment ('VLE'), ELITE.
